One deaf hospital patient in Jacksonville Beach said she was given a stuffed monkey instead of the sign-language interpreter she requested for hours. Feeling isolated, she finally asked nurses for something to hold.

Another said she thought she was being denied medical care because there was no interpreter to explain why they needed her to wait in a hallway at Baptist Medical Center South. She later learned hospital staff lost a list of sign-language interpreters her mother had given them.

A third woman couldn't hear when emergency workers at Baptist Medical Center downtown called her name.

The three women are among seven hearing-impaired emergency-room patients suing Baptist Health Systems for violating the Americans With Disabilities Act by failing to provide qualified sign-language interpreters. The lawsuit was filed in federal court last week by Jacksonville Area Legal Aid.

Baptist spokeswoman Cindy Hamilton said the hospital hadn't been served with a copy of the lawsuit so she couldn't comment on it directly. But she said Baptist is committed to effective communication between staff and patients and their families, lists communication resources on its website and provides several means, including interpreters and devices,

“Access to hospitals and medical providers in this area has been a problem for a long time,” Caserta said. “... Effective communication ensures impartial access to care and fosters an uninhibited discussion between medical staff and the patient.”

Other Northeast Florida hospitals contacted by The Times-Union said they provide some sort of interpretive services for hearing-impaired patients. At Memorial Hospital Jacksonville, for instance, spokesman Adam Landau said the facility has a 24-hour agreement with the Independent Living Resource Center of Northeast Florida to provide interpreters who stay with their patients as long as they are hospitalized.

Shands Jacksonville spokesman Dan Leveton said interpreters can be requested through patient services but sometimes may not be immediately available.

Caserta said of the local hospitals, only the Mayo Clinic has a consistent reputation for providing for the needs of hearing-impaired patients. One goal of the Baptist litigation, she said, is that it will educate surrounding hospitals about the need.
